

Welcome to our special issue on Canadian foreign policy, in which we are partnering with the Centre for International Governance Innovation, Canada's pre-eminent think tank on foreign policy and international governance. The Trudeau government has significantly re-oriented Canada's foreign policy since last November with a renewed focus on multilateralism, Canada-US relations and, per a new set of marching orders Prime Minister Justin Trudeau delivered to summoned diplomats on June 9, human rights. We have an exceptional line-up of experts and front-line veterans expounding on all of the above, and the latest on politics.

In this Issue: Foreign Policy

- To begin, pollster Darrell Bricker and his colleague Sean Simpson have Ipsos rankings of public policy issues, taken just days before Canadians voted last October, that show just where foreign policy ranks among Canadians' concerns.
- UBC's Taylor Owen has a must-read piece on the enormous impact of the internet and its social, financial, criminal and political players on international power structures and the legacy institutions of global governance.
- Former Canadian Ambassador to the United States Derek Burney and Fen Osler Hampson examine the state of Canada-US relations during a presidential election season, and conclude that Canadians should fasten their seat beats for what looks like a bumpy ride no matter who wins the White House next November.
- CIGI President Rohinton P. Medhora draws on his experience as a former executive at the International Development Research Centre to offer historical context for the Trudeau government's foreign aid review.
- Former UN ambassador Paul Heinbecker and Andrew S. Thompson look at the global refugee crisis and write that: "The world is struggling to cope with roughly 60 million refugees and displaced persons," approaching three per cent of the global population, an urgent humanitarian crisis.
- Former CIBC chief economist Jeff Rubin, now an author and CIGI Senior Fellow, looks at the future of Canada's oil sands and says it was already precarious before the Fort McMurray wildfire due to both COP 21 emissions reduction targets and the crash in oil prices. For her part, Céline Bak examines climate change and innovation after COP 21.
- Veteran trade policy analyst Dan Ciuriak considers the prospects for pending CETA and Trans-Pacific trade deals and sees them running into heavy political headwinds. Canada's first priority, he writes, should be to "seal the deal" negotiated with the European Union. And Domenico Lombardi asks "Whither the G20?"
- University of Waterloo Professor Hongying Wang looks at the relationship between Canada and China, and suggests the arrival of the Trudeau government presents an opportunity for turning the page, especially on trade.
- In Canada and the World, Contributing Writer David McLaughlin takes us inside the Progressive Conservative campaign that swept Manitoba on April 19. McLaughlin served as campaign director for the Conservatives, who won 40 out of 57 seats in the Legislature, and tells how they did it.
- The federal Conservative and Liberal parties held policy conventions the last weekend in May. In Vancouver, Yaroslav
  Baran found the Tories in a surprisingly upbeat mood, while in Winnipeg the Liberals took a victory lap. The concurrent conventions offered a striking role reversal in terms of open media coverage that reflected the Conservative and Liberal reversals of fortune. As Don Newman notes in his column: "Clearly, once a party is in government, it acts like a government. The simple fact is that if it didn't, it would be unlikely to be the government for very long."
- Contributing Writer David Mitchell looks at the Liberal climb-down from stacking the special committee on parliamentary reform, and how resolving the deadlock over process may enhance the prospects for success on substance.
- From the University of Ottawa law faculty, court watcher and author Carissima Mathen follows the assisted dying bill from the House to the Senate, where it missed the June 6 deadline set by the Supreme Court for compliance with its decision of last year.
- Finally, in a Verbatim, former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney takes a look at the US and Canadian political scenes and their possible impact on public policy. With the US presidential campaign bogged down in protectionism, and prospects for TPP approval "dim at best", he urges Canada to pursue bilateral trade agreements with our Pacific partners.

Enjoy your summer.
